

THE ROLE OF AN SSF WORKER ON CAMPUS

What is the purpose of a student?

To earn a degree?

To get a job?

To build a career?

Yes.

But if education gives us a certificate and takes away our character...
what exactly have we learned?

A campus is not merely a place where buildings stand and classes happen.
A campus is where human beings are built.

And this is where the role of an SSF worker begins.

An SSF worker on campus is not simply someone who organizes programs.
Not someone who carries a flag.
Not someone who appears on a stage.

He is someone who carries a responsibility.
A responsibility to serve.
A responsibility to guide.
A responsibility to listen.

Because behind every classroom door, there may be a student fighting a battle nobody knows about.

Someone struggling academically.
Someone losing direction.
Someone addicted to a screen.
Someone addicted to something else.

And sometimes...
all that person needs is one human being who cares enough to ask, "Are you okay?"

That is service.

Today, campus life has changed.
Our conversations happen on WhatsApp.

Our opinions are shaped by Instagram.
Our attention is captured by algorithms.

In such an environment, an SSF worker must not merely be active offline.
He must carry his values into the digital world.
He must know when to speak...
and, more importantly, when not to speak.

He must challenge hatred without creating more hatred.
He must disagree without disrespect.
He must represent Islam through wisdom, not merely through words.
Because people may forget our speeches.
They may forget our posters.
But they will remember...
how we treated them.

And there is another responsibility.

An SSF worker must never become a person who demands leadership but avoids service.

If there is a problem, he must not ask,
“Who will solve it?”
He must ask,
“What can I do?”

If a student needs help, serve.
If the campus needs blood donors, organize.
If someone needs guidance, listen.
If society needs responsible citizens, become one.
Because leadership is not standing in front of people.
Leadership is standing behind people when they need support.

My dear friends,

SSF on campus should not create students who are known only for religious programs.
It should create students who are known for discipline, excellence, compassion, integrity and service.

Let our academics be strong.
Let our character be stronger.
Let our knowledge increase.
And when we finally leave the campus...

Let people not simply say,
“He was an SSF worker.”

Let them say,
“Because he was here, this campus became a little better.”

That... is the real role of an SSF worker.

Not to occupy a position, but to carry a responsibility.
Not to seek recognition, but to create impact.
Not merely to lead students, but to serve humanity.

Thank you.
